LOGLINE

A lonely construction worker from China goes missing at a Singapore land reclamation site, and a sleepless police investigator must put himself in the mind of the migrant to uncover the truth beneath all that sand.

SYNOPSIS

Set in industrial Singapore, police investigator Lok must find missing migrant worker Wang.

Wang suffers a worksite accident and is anxious about repatriation. Unable to sleep, Wang starts frequenting a dreamy cybercafé in the dead of the night. Hoping to look for some form of human connection in this foreign land he feels alienated from, Wang forms a virtual friendship with a mysterious gamer that takes a sinister turn.

When Wang suddenly disappears, Lok digs deep into the trail leading to a land reclamation site, in order to uncover the truth beneath all that sand.

DIRECTOR'S STATEMENT

Singapore has garnered itself a reputation as a modern economic miracle, turning itself from a fishing village to a thriving modern economy over the short period of only a few decades.

Such a feat is possible due to its ability to systematically engineer a land designed through land reclamation and endless construction projects. By perpetually reshaping itself, it negates natural geographical formations, rendering them into perfectly straight and angular shorelines – a land as though imagined up by some geometrical mind.

Even the people on this imaginary land are at the same time equally imagined. As a country of immigrants, its demography is wholly dependent on migration policies and economic considerations. New migrants are brought into the fold to reinvigorate the imagination of this economic miracle – a success story that is built upon the backs of low wage migrant labourers from the region who are hired to build a nation they can never become a part of.

The Cost of Imaginations

These indentured workers live in the outskirts of the restless city; existing in the blind spot of larger society; their exploitation remains unseen. They are the invisible and imaginary – they are the sleepless, the dreamless.

With no recourse for grievances, the migrant workers live in precarity. The constant fear of repatriation, with debt incurred from training and agency fees even before they start to work and earn, continue to entrap them in their wretched situation.

What should happen if they go missing? Who would look for them? Would anyone even care to know? The film is premised on these questions by an unwilling police investigator, looking for a missing worker whose migrant working-class reality is so far removed from his own that it seems a far cry to reconcile. Yet that is exactly what he must do to find the missing worker and solve the case.

Transformation through Social Imaginaries

In developing this film, I too found it difficult to write about a group of people whose lives are so inextricably interwoven with mine, but yet so different from my own. It took me three years to research this topic from both the political and the human level – the migrant workers I interviewed, the company that employs them, the NGOs and activists who represent them and the government who must ultimately protect them.

But I found that approaching the topic from the outside was just not enough. I wanted to know their dreams and their fears, their joys and their jokes; I needed to know what keeps them up at night. So I spent my days with them over a long period of time and started to see them in a new light, not just as a function of society but every bit as human. I found myself transformed like the character of the police investigator in my film and hope to share this new light, through the projection of cinema, with my audience.

Imagining a Land: The Sleepless, the Dreaming and the Fold
AN INTERVIEW WITH DIRECTOR YEO SIEW HUA BY PHILIP CHEAH

A LAND IMAGINED delves into land reclamation, migrant labour, dreams and sleeplessness—subjects that are not seen in relation to one another. What led you to conceive of this mix of themes?

The film is the culmination of my thoughts on the island-state where I live and work. This is a land that has been “reclaiming” itself since before its inception as a nation and has never stopped filling its seas with sand to expand its land mass. Much of this sand is imported from other countries, like the labour that is brought here to help reshape this land.

What I find problematic, is that most of the discourse I gather about the migrant workforce is concerned with social integration and rhetoric on being good “hosts” to the “guests”, without ever dealing with the root cause that divides us-and-them, all the while perpetuating the othering effect of the alien(ation). It is why this film seeks, not only to expose the structural exploitation at work but more importantly, humanize through understanding that they too have hopes and dreams.

Because to dream is to be able to transform and transformation is life. On the other hand, sleeplessness -or the inability to think beyond the confines of the self and imagine the other- is a form of death. This death is experienced by Lok, the police investigator who is stuck in his own privileged life of solitude until he is finally able to dream again and reunite in the revelry of life.

We see a mix of genres too, with elements of the investigative thriller, the police procedural, social realist drama, and a lingering sense of film noir. Why was it important for you to refer to these forms in A LAND IMAGINED?

Like all good mysteries, the police investigative format is able to draw an audience into participation in solving the case. The film seeks to make complicit the audience in the search of Wang, by placing themselves in the environment of the migrant worker and living out his experience, in the process creating an empathetic need to understand the character and his world.

As a film that tries to provoke a change in perspective, it is useful for me to employ genre conventions that come with their own set expectations. Shifting between an investigative thriller and a social realist drama, the film takes on a fluidity that subverts these expectations and questions the audience what they are watching, instead of being passive spectators to the events unfolding before them.

The use of film noir tropes was deliberate to set a mood and a way to enter the film. I want to signal to the audience that the problems our characters have to work through are not merely skin-deep plot intrigue, but a complex labyrinth of the mind, like most noir films. Since a large part of the film is set in the night, creating the right noir ambience effectively brought out a certain quality of my sleepless characters as they drift through a city that is at once familiar yet strange. It was also an interesting experiment in creating a noir film in the tropics with the monsoon pouring down on us, resulting in a “wet noir” look that I found beautiful and uniquely refreshing.

There is a distinct structural shift of time, space and perspective in the middle of the film that seems to go beyond a flashback. Were there certain ideas of identity and the flux of time at play here? In a certain way, this is the magic realism of your film.

Employing a structure that plays with a certain folding of time beyond a mere flashback was my way of melding two seemingly disparate perspectives into a singularity. The transformation of these perspectives is strung together by their dreaming of each other; the one who finds and the one who wants to be found.

However, it is important that this dreaming is not reduced to a mere hallucination, so as not to trivialize the very real plight of those who are oppressed by their conditions. I wish to challenge my audience in constructing the film’s multiple perspectives, while retaining the veracity of the story I have created based on real-life experiences, told to me by those of the migrant communities I have spoken to.

This magic realism that I have been developing since my previous film IN THE HOUSE OF STRAW, de-familiarizes the everyday encounters and puts in question the so-called “facts” that I would like my audience to take a closer look and reflect upon. It is also akin to my own experience of living in a city like Singapore where I feel, at the same time, at home and an alien to.

What drew you to your multinational cast - including the veteran Singaporean actor Peter Yu, Liu Xiaoyi from China who lives and is based in Singapore, Jack Tan from Malaysia, Luna Kwok (Guo Yue) from China and Ishtiaque Zico from Bangladesh - for their roles?

In trying to create a story about migrants, it was important for me to cast the right mix of voices in my film. We spent a long time picking the right actors and I am delighted by the wonderful chemistry between them that this diversity has brought to the film. Although not exhaustively so, but in a way, it is a microcosm of the melting pot of cultures from the context where I am from.

I would add that not just the cast but even the crew is of a multinational mix. My main collaborators, including producer Fran Borgia from Spain, cinematographer Hideho Urata from Japan and production designer James Page from the UK, have all contributed in bringing their own brand of sensibility to the film. Even when they have all lived in Singapore for a long time, they were able to give an outsider's insight into the portrayal of the migrant experience represented in the film.

There is a note of the strange in your depiction of the seemingly mundane construction site and the cybercafé where they are also online much of the time. What is this land you are ultimately imagining for the film?

Set mostly in the industrial west of Singapore, the film explores a landscape that is not the familiar glitzy skyscraper, but the ugly machinery tucked away at the fringe that runs it. When I first visited the construction work site for my research, I remember my body was thrown into shock from the harsh conditions faced everyday by the workers. The merciless sand blowing incessantly at one's face and the brutal cacophony of noise generated from the machines was utterly unbearable.

Much of the visual and audio design of the film is based on my wanting to capture this reality and present it on screen. I don't believe such working conditions are something that one can ever get used to, so it was a conscious decision to heighten the experience of the work site to a certain intensity and not just a humdrum routine.

The dirt and grime is contrasted to the sordid cybercafé frequent by Wang. Operating twenty-four hours, these cybercafés become a haven for the sleepless and the lonely. It exists as a liminal space between night and day, real and virtual, connection and alienation. Since a large part of our lives are lived out virtually today, I think it is relevant to engage not just on the level of physical lonesome, but also the virtual disconnection when the film weaves its narration through computer gameplay, while playing on our desensitized attitudes towards violence, in all its forms.
